You are now looking down from an aeroplane on the grand and glorious city of ——— Well, what's your guess? It's a station stop for trains between New York and Washington, though you have probably never gotten off there nor ever will if you judge the town by what you can see from the car windows. The stream on the right is neither the Passaic nor the Raritan, but a canal that parallels the Delaware River. Now you have guessed it—that city of linoleum, pottery, bricks, rubber and tiles—the busy little capital of New York's most intimate neighbor, New Jersey. The gilded dome of the Capitol, which you glimpse from the train as it crosses the state line into Pennsylvania, shows in the centre of the picture. Trenton is New Jersey's fourth largest city, and here's the best aerial photograph ever taken of it.

Ledger Photo

HOTEL ASTOR COFFEE

The finest coffee in the world is grown on the slopes of the Andes Mountains

The trail on the slopes of the Andes

Coffee en route to river port

Loading coffee on river steamer