by 10,000 men distributed amongst them. An enemy disposed to act seriously about attacking you would never, speak of Charleston, New-York, Norfolk, or Wilmington, with such a force as you have provided to oppose them? They could hardly get one of their generals to acquire the command of such a petty expedition. Either the Emperor of France or his Dictatorship would consider himself degraded by sending out such a paltry equipment. But it is said that this sort of reasoning would apply as well to 100,000 men as to 6000. Without being quite sure of that point as to whether the other sort of reasoning, that this is but a part, would not apply to a corresponding part even to 100,000. Would it not equally apply to another Austerlitz? Would it not equally apply to another Austerlitz? Would it not equally apply to another Austerlitz?
