THE THYNGS OF EXETER.

In the early days of the town the Thyngs were a very prominent family. Their name was often written "Thing"; but it was at the start, "Thyng," and in England probably "Thyune." I know several branches of the descendants. Some of them have changed their name to "Thwing," and others have taken new names, as I suppose; for, if it were not so, the name would be very common at this day. Their burial place was on the high knoll, near the gas house, on Water Street. They may have had other burial places in the town. Several monuments there have inscriptions of the early forefathers of that honored name. The history of Exeter calls this a "neglected burying ground," and says "Rev. Samuel Dudley had a tomb there, beneath a large stone, with a mortise for a tablet." I was there yesterday and found the tombstone still lying on the ground, just as it was in 1848.

The Ladd family were also buried there, and a large iron railing with granite posts surrounds their graves. The iron bar is about two inches square, yet in one place it is broken from the post, and the posts are leaning over. The neighbors are plowing up and planting the borders of the graveyard. They have set apple trees on it. There were two bee-hives standing on Rev. Samuel Dudley's tombstone. I was told that a man by the name of Kelly owned the surrounding land. I have written to the
