

JOSEPH MORRIS, uncle William's second son, is a bachelor, and has resided with his aged mother who is still living. James Morris, uncle William's youngest son, was a graduate of the University of Virginia. He married Miss Smith, the daughter of Marcellus Smith, and granddaughter of Governor James Pleasants, and resides in Louisa. . . .

HARRIET MORRIS, married a Mr. Michie. . . .

ELLEN MORRIS, married first a Mr. Carr of Albemarle, and, after his death, a Mr. Barker of Kentucky, in which state she now resides. . . .

JULIET MORRIS married James Fontaine, her cousin and mine, and presented her husband with seven or eight children, the last of whom were twins. . . .

SUSAN MORRIS is well known to several of you and it is needless, therefore, for me to expatiate on her many virtues. She married James Watson, her cousin by the mother's side, whose untimely death soon left her a young widow with two infant children. She has a fine estate near the Green Springs, where she now resides with her aged mother. . . .

MARY and ELIZABETH MORRIS, the youngest of uncle William's daughters, were twins. They are both married, Mary to Doctor Minor, and Elizabeth to Mr. Theo S. Watson, the brother of her sister Susan's husband. They both still reside in their native County of Louisa. . . .

JOHN MORRIS

John Morris, my grandfather Morris's second son, removed at an early period to the State of Kentucky, where he now resides. He married Miss Innes, the daughter of Judge Henry Innes, who was the brother of Colonel James Innes of Virginia, an officer distinguished in the Revolutionary war. . . . This lady, on the mother's side, was the granddaughter of Colonel James Callaway of Bedford County in Virginia. . . . Soon after his marriage, uncle John brought his wife to Virginia. . . . Though a child at that time, I have a distinct recollection of his lady. She was a most lovely brunette, and her daughters, I understand, have inherited a large share of her personal beauty. She had a numerous progeny by my uncle. One of his daughters, I am told, married the brother of John James Crittenden, the late Governor of Kentucky. . . . The bridegroom, after removing to Arkansas, was killed in a duel. . . .

Uncle John must be now upwards of eighty; and still hale and vigorous. . . . The estimation in which he is held demonstrates that he has faithfully fulfilled his duties as a citizen.

CHARLES MORRIS

Charles Morris, my grandfather Morris's third son, was destined from early life for the medical profession. His education was, consequently, more liberal than that of his elder brothers. He spent several sessions at Washington College and, after pursuing his medical studies for some time under the instruction of Dr. McCaw, of Richmond, completed his professional course, in the University of Pennsylvania. Having obtained his diploma, he established himself as a physician in Hanover. He lived at first with his father, but in the unhappy difference between his parents he displayed a strong leaning in favor of his venerable mother; in consequence of which pardonable indiscretion he was harshly discarded from the paternal mansion. In his exile he took refuge at the house of Colonel Charles Dabney, where, at the invitation of that pattern of benevolence, he continued to reside for a year or two. He removed
