

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ROBERT MANN.

temperament than her two younger brothers. She and her brother Harvey, with whom she made her home after her mother's death, were most like their father. She became an active member of the Baptist Church. She had many friends, and had it not been for the pinch of poverty that always accompanied the career of my father, her fortunes might have been quite different. She was with us a few weeks when we moved to Mill Hall, and my wife long remembered the interest she took in fixing us up in the old house that was to be our future home. A few months after she left us she went to Lewistown to visit my brother William's family, where she died suddenly of dysentery, in the thirty-second year of her age.

STEPHEN GILLETTE MANN,

in my father's estimation, excelled all his brothers in nobility of nature. Without disputing the correctness of this judgment, I have noticed that parents most deeply sympathize with the forlorn and unfortunate of their children. Stephen worked faithfully for his brothers William and Harvey Mann up to the time of the Manns & Smith failure, and for Harvey Mann many years
