II. RICHARD, son of Richard (Rock), m. Hannah ———. History says he served in the war against King Philip. Tradition says his wife and two children had a painful experience with the Indians, probably during his absence in that fierce conflict. The Indians made an attack on the town where they lived (name forgotten) and the inhabitants fled to a sloop, which was the only craft then lying in harbor. The last person to step over the side was Mrs. Taylor, with an infant in her arms and a little boy beside her. As she went on board, the Captain, drawing his sword as a token of authority, forbade any more coming on board lest the sloop sink. They then went to Boston, where Mrs. Taylor left the sloop, knowing neither where to go nor what to do. After walking some distance she sat down by the roadside and, reflecting upon her destitute condition, began to weep. Soon a gentleman passed and after walking a few rods, returned and asked if she was one of the company who had escaped from the Indians. Being answered in the affirmative, he told her to remain where she was until he returned and he would provide for her the coming night. After a short absence he returned bringing another gentleman, who took her eldest boy, while he provided for Mrs. Taylor and infant until she could care for them herself.
