best friend Campion. Dr. Jessop says that foremost among the throng who pressed near to catch the martyr's last words, or, if possible, to obtain some relic of him to keep as a treasure, was young Henry Walpole. When the executioner had finished his bloody work, and flung Campion's quarters into the cauldron that was simmering hard by, the blood spurted out upon Henry Walpole and bespattered his garments. At this sight every impulse of indignation and horror stirred within him, and it seemed that there had come to him a call from Heaven to take up the work which had been so cruelly cut short, and to follow that path which Campion had trodden. From that moment his course was determined, and from that day he devoted himself to the cause for which Edmund Campion had died. From henceforth he became an object of suspicion. His biographers assert that he had made himself obnoxious, converting more than twenty young men who were his associates, and there was a danger that by remaining in his native country he should compromise his relations; so he sailed for France, and arrived at Rheims July 7th, 1582, and then he set out for Rome. He was received as a student into the English College, and in January he offered himself to the Society of Jesus, and in 1584 he was admitted as a probationer. Two years he spent at Point-à-Mousson, during which time he was "Prefect of the Convictory." He was ordained priest at Paris in 1588. In 1593 he again returned to England, but was immediately arrested, and straightway
