

from beyond the moat through the shrubbery. The west view was taken from the direction of the barns.

Great and Little Hormead and West Mill are mentioned in the Domesday book of England made by William the Conqueror in 1086, as manors, and they were later instituted into parishes. The two churches of Great and Little Hormead are about one-quarter of a mile apart, and the two parishes are now united and occupy the church at Great Hormead, the rector being the Rev. J. Smith.

The church at Great Hormead is surrounded with large shade trees, and makes a very pleasing view from the roadway. The churchyard contains the remains of Walter Wescott Wyman of Hormead Hall, and members of his family.

The church at Little Hormead is a comparatively small structure, the
