

evil. It is very seldom that we see a child attentive to "mother," who has grown "gray" in rearing her offspring. They allow themselves to be influenced by those who are utterly incapable of giving wholesome advice, receiving impressions which are anything but respectful in their nature. Ill-natured remarks from children wound a mother's heart that is yearning for a "kind word" from those she tenderly loves. This is the one thing a mother craves above all others—gratitude and love from her children. Ah, yes; it is as sweet as the fragrance of May flowers.

The first Emory mentioned in the Land Records at Annapolis, Md. (Liber 10, folio 39r), is Arthur Emory, who came to Maryland in 1666, with his wife, Mary, and two children. From the copies of Talbot County wills, in the court-house at Annapolis, Liber H. folio 269, it appears that Arthur Emory, Sr., of Talbot County, died 1699, leaving sons—John, William and Arthur—a daughter, Ann, and a widow (presumably his second wife), Katharine. One of the witnesses to the will was Arthur Emory, Jr. The widow seems to have married Edmund Prior. There is an account of Edmund Prior and Katharine, his wife, as executors of Arthur Emory, dated August 8, 1701, and in a will, dated April, 1747, Katharine Prior bequeathes certain property to her children, John Emory, Sr., William Emory, Arthur Emory, Ann Glanden and William Prior. According to the records, Arthur Emory, the immigrant, acquired certain lands, known as "Emory's Neglect," etc., on Wye River, part of the tract owned by the Emory family, around Queenstown, including the farms recently owned by Mr. J. P. Davidson, Robert Willson, Hiram G. Dudley and Louis Hergenrather, their names being "Green Spring" (or "Beverley"), "Warrington," "Hemsley" or "Emory's Fortune," and "Four Chimneys." Arthur Emory, who died in 1747, and lies buried at "Ingleside," where his tombstone, with its inscription still legible, may be seen, was evidently the son of Arthur, the immigrant, who died in 1699, as he inherited part of the tract above described, and bequeathed it, with other holdings, to his sons, Thomas, James, Gideon, John and Arthur. His daughters were: Ann Sudler, Sarah Carter, Juliana Kemp and Selitia Kirby. His widow was Jacquelin, who was buried in the same grave with her husband, at Ingleside. Her name appears on the tombstone, which has grown dull from age, as "Lacklina," evidently intended for Jacquelin Littleton (Littleton). According to the same inscrip-
