

“DECEMBER”

from a painting by

WALTER L. PALMER

Some thirty years ago Walter L. Palmer, of Albany, painted “January,” a canvas that won for him the Hallgarten Prize at the National Academy. Since then he has specialized, and successfully so, on winterscapes—paintings that have won for him medals at many of the leading art exhibitions, both in this country and abroad, and an enviable place of high honor in the ranks of American painters. No one has interpreted the beauty of snow scenes more sympathetically than has Walter Palmer.

He has always approached the subject with the heart of a poet, and each new canvas is an eloquent appeal to the lover of the beautiful. His interpretations are always fresh, vital and uplifting—never depressing or gloomy.

The original painting of “December” is now on exhibition at the galleries of E. & A. Milch, 108 West 57th Street, New York City.
